In the stirring dramatization of the white slave horrors "Smashing the Vice Trust," which comes to the Opera House Wednesday evening, is the first authentic portrayal of how the victims of the vice interests are actually sold. There is a reproduction of the actual white slave auction rooms on Allen Street, New York City, where in a dingy saloon, under thundering elevated trains, young women are actually bought and sold in lots, very much like negro slaves were auctioned from the block.

"THE DRUG TERROR," the new six reel sensational photodrama which comes to the Opera House Thursday night, has been produced with great care and at great expense. The picture portrays every step in the life of a drug victim. It shows the life of a young society man who dies miserably as a result of becoming a victim of drugs. The picture exposes the methods of dealers, the dens in which the drug is used and peddlers selling to little school children drug laced candies. Through it all runs a love story, which ends in a broken home, and wrecked lives.
